From the time of the cave paintings to the early Renaissance and the advent of the printing press, Western artists, in particular, developed new techniques of perceiving three-dimensional space, visualized in two-dimensional paint. Thus, paintings in three-dimensional space stimulated an interest in the art of perspective, as the concept of space had never played so important a role in art. Viewers have to learn to perceive three-dimensional space, which is defined in terms of its depth, width and height. However, the functions of the three spatial dimensions change markedly from one point of view to another. In the visual arts, three-dimensional space has been interpreted mainly in terms of linear perspective. Linear perspective effectively combines drawing and painting and has long been recognised as the most effective technique for visualizing space in terms of the art of perspective. Yet, there has long been an awareness of the limitations of this technique. This has encouraged artists to avoid and often escape from the conventional space of the single art painting. By introducing paint in three-dimensional space and various time effects such as motion, movement and time, artists have continuously questioned the formal limits of the single art painting. Artists have often played with the traditional understanding of art and thus allowed the traditional image to be transformed into something else. In the course of the last two centuries, artists have developed a wide range of techniques that can be used to transform the three-dimensional reality of a painting into something different, which has often led to a dialogue with other art disciplines. Out of this dialogue came a number of new techniques that challenge the range of the viewing experience of the traditional art painting, such as the cubist and futurist paintings. In the classical era of the Renaissance, artists have developed the technique of "clay models," which were early forerunners 6d1f23a050
